THREE KNOCKS-A BERKSHIRE LEGEND. At the beginning of the last or close of the preceding century, a very skilful and eminent apothecary and surgeon resided in the outskirts of Newbury, as much beloved for his social qualities as he was valued for the knowledge of his profession. Amongst his patients and acquaintances was an elderly maiden lady of slender forme, and of a sour and avaricious temper; these qualities were increased by a burden thrown upon her, which, sordid as was her nature, she could not avoid. An improvident brother died insolvent, and a beautiful girl of sixteen, his only child, was left entirely to the unwilling protection of her aunt. Heart-broken at the loss of her father, harassed by the perpetual peevishness of her aunt, scantily fed, and poorly clad, the poor young creature sank under her change of circumstances, and became seriously ill. The good surgeon was called in, and speedily detected that the malady was mental. One day, when alone with her, he said:

"I see, my dear, what really ails you; your aunt's treatment is killing you by mehes. I can do nothing for you, unless you will accept such a home as I can give you. If you can overlook the great disproportion in age, I think I could make it a happy home; you should have every comfort in my power to afford you, and at least it will be a happier life than that you lead at present."
The young woman gratefully accepted the offer, they were married, and for two years no persons could have been apparently better suited to each other, though the difference in age was more than thirty years.

At that period the surgeon received a letter from an intimate friend, an eminent physician in London, requesting as a favor that he would receive as a boarder for a few weeks a young gentleman, in whom he felt a particular interest. He described him as highly talented and informed, who had, by great industry and application, attained considerable eminence at the bar, but whose Lealth had sunk under the intense labor he had undergone through the winter; that consumptive symptoms had appeared, and nothing was likely to save his life but total rest from business, a change to good air, und the regular superintendence of a skilful medical man; and knowing the skill and kindness of his friend, the airy situation of his house, and its capability to accommodate an inmate, he ventured to solicit an admittance for his young patient. The request was instantly granted, and the invalid took possession of a good apartment over the usualisitting room, and received every attention from the surgeon and his wife.

To the latter this shortly became as dangerous at it was interesting; the invalid was attractive in person, and in every way formed to win the affections; he found his young companion (who by her husband's continual absence during his professional employment was constantly alone with him) full of natural talent, but wholly uninformed; he took great delight in improving her mind, read and conversed with her, and every day increased their mutual interest in each other. Unhappily the young lawyer had imbibed many dangerous and skeptical opinions-these he imparted to his pupil, and amongst others, the total unbelief of a future state was impressed on her mind by the strong conviction he professed to entertain on

He remained through the summer months. and having much recovered his health, returned to town to resume his profession, leaving his unhappy victim a prey to melancholy, and unable to attend to the duties the had before so cheerfully fulfilled. surgeon was applied to, and again received the destroyer of his peace, and bestowed every attention on a case which he was soon aware was hopeless. The unhappy young man had also a similar persuasion, and his mind appeared to suffer still more than his frame; doubts and terror arose, and he continually held conversations with the wife, in which he stated these new impressions, and told her his greatest misery arose from the idea that he had perverted her religious principles, and that he should have to answer for ples, and that he should have to answer for ginal growth,) immediately on the Railroad, and the destruction of her soul as well as his own. But he frequently repeated, "If there be a future state and a final judgment, and if it be possible for a departed spirit to return to earth, you shall have some warning when I am dead, which may decide your opinion."

with it a renewal of the solemn pledge he had before given. Worn down by grief and fatigue, she was unable to follow the body to the grave, but the good and unsuspecting husband, willing to show every regard to the dead, made the whole of his small establishment attend the funeral.

She was left alone in her agony. During the latter part of the invalid's life, when he and Alexandria Railroad—a very short distance was seated in the chair by the fireside, a cane from either, and bounded partly by the extension was seated in the chair by the fireside, a cane was placed across the arm, with which he used to summon his watchful friend when her domestic business took her away for a short time. At that period bells were not in common use; three distinct strokes on the tered by several never-failing springs, and by a floor gave the signal of her being wanted in stream which runs through it. The improvements the sick room, and it was promptly obeyed. She started up, looked to the apartment, and on approaching the fireplace saw the cane, which she had that very day placed in the corner of the room leaning against the arm of the chair in the position it had so long occupied in the life of her lover. When she recovered her senses she requested to be alone with her husband, and falling on her knees, confessed everything which had passed, and supplicated his forgiveness: it was granted by the kind hearted old man, and with expressions of blame to himself for having exposed so young a creature to such a danger. She then requested to see the clergyman, who was a again. [nov 5-cotf] A. S.
